If I were a bird, I would soar through the clear blue sky thus be able to see everything vividly underneath me ----- picturesque mountains; shimmering seas; tropical rainforests...

I would fly dynamic of heights and chase the sun. I would explore the clouds in their various shapes and forms, and other birds, big or small.

I would explore the make friends with freedom --- no homework; no school; lessons. Oh! How wonderful life

After my flights, I would perch on a cherry blossom tree and rest while chirping rhythmic tunes for animals; humans and other living things to admire. Then, I would dive down to the wavy river or a quick stream to have a few gulps of sparkling water while catching an earthworm or two.

When I had rested enough, I would be fully recharged to explore higher skies, seeing places I had not yet ventured. I can visualize this in my mind---flapping my wings, brushing against soft breeze and towering past tree tops. And should I see a big waterfall, I would glide along the rapid water all the way down, and have a race with the fish.

At dusk, I would watch the sun slowly, silently and gradually sink into the furthest end of the horizon, colouring the sky a rosy shade.

Before night fell, I would use all the twigs and moss I managed to find to build myself a comfortable nest. I would look for worms and maybe a tail of fish if I was ever hungry.

Then when night eventually crept up, I would lie in my cosy nest and watch the glittering stars above, watching them in awe as they glow before my big black bird eyes.
